Double Drive Time

The California Public Utilities Commission (the institution that grants movers licenses) requires all licensed moving companies to charge "double drive time" on hourly rated moves.

In essence, double drive time means you don't get charged for the time it takes to get to your home from our warehouse, or in other words the drive to your origin. We also don't charge you for the time it takes after the move is complete to get back to our warehouse.

The diagram illustrates the concept of double drive time. It shows two house icons representing a 'Loading location' on the left and an 'Unloading location' on the right. A red arrow points from the loading location to the unloading location, labeled '15 min drive'. Below the arrow, it states 'Double drive time = 30min'.

The reason the PUC does it that way is because you can actually "see" the amount of time it takes to get from your origin to your destination. You would not be able to know how long it takes to get to your origin from the warehouse, or to get to the warehouse from your destination so movers aren't allowed to use this. So instead, the law says to pay twice for the time in the "middle" to represent the total drive time involved with your move.
